Germantown Telegraph It is a noticeable fact that the agricultural colleges throughout the republic, with very few exceptions, have failed in carrying out the purposes of their creation. The idea of Congress in voting among the states proportionate shares of the public lands to establish institutions for agricultural education, mainly, has met the public sentiment; and the Legislatures of many of the states carried out the idea more or less in accordance with the original design. But it was soon discovered that the agricultural interests had not reached a point sufficiently advanced to sustain with the necessary patronage the capacious and comprehensive institutions which the states considered indispensable in carrying out the supposed purposes of Congress; and the result has generally been that the agricultural colleges teach as little as possible a knowledge of practical agriculture, while education for the several professions has almost exclusively absorbed the duties of the instructors.

In referring to these institutions in the several New England states, a leading Boston paper holds this language: "If these institutions are doing anything to benefit agriculture in New England, if there was any evidence that the young men graduated at these institutions became practical farmers, or did anything to encourage or improve farming in New-England, there could be no objection to annual legislative grants to keep in a flourishing condition. We have first and last seen several lists of the graduates of these colleges with their residences and employments after being educated at an agricultural college. From such lists we have found that while many graduates became lawyers, physicians and teachers, very few become farmers in their own states. We have not the statistics at hand, but we beleive that it may be safely asserted that not one in ten of the young men educated in and graduated from our agricultural colleges are engaged to-day in agricultural pursuits in the States by whose aid they received their education."

This statement does not differ from our own so-called agricultural coliege. It turns out very few farmers, not more than perhaps one in ten or fifteen of the pupils; but educates, mainly at the expense of the state, the bulk of its students for lawyers, doctors, ministers, &c. Even the ornamental forms of the regular colleges, so unbecoming in a school of young farmers, have been introduced, increasing the expense and giving the students flashy conceptions of their position altogether foreign to the character of such an institution. We have our doubts of the propriety of the Legislature granting any more aid to ours in Centre county. It ought to be self-sustaining with its present income, if we are rightly-informed as to the extent of it and to the labors which its present list of students required from instructors.

She feels very grateful for the benefit she has derived therefrom and savs that until she has derived therefrom, and says that until she has derived therefrom, and says that until she used it her stomach could bear no vege-table food for over three years.
